Rights are the demands for human rights and freedoms, which are based on moral or legal grounds. Legal scientist Semond said very simply, "What others have to do for me is my right."

Rights are of two types - Rights are moral rights until they are recognized by law. And when they are recognized by law, they become legal rights. In a broad sense, rights are of two types:

Moral rights

Legal rights

Moral rights: Rights that are based on morality and whose violation is a moral crime are called moral rights. For example, parents have the moral right to receive respect from their children.

Legal rights: Rights that are recognized by the law of the country and whose violation is a legal crime are called legal rights. For example, the right of a lender to get back the money he borrowed.
